The Master of Leadership in Global Development provides you with knowledge and tools to develop deep technical and management knowledge and skills to lead the most demanding and challenging global development projects. By bringing together mid-career professionals from across the public and private sectors and a range of low-, middle- and high-income countries, the program will foster new and truly global collaboration and networks.

The state of global development is rapidly changing. The demographics of migration, urbanisation, and aging populations are massively shifting. Inequality keeps rising, despite improvement in base poverty levels. Global problems like climate change, arms trade, and human trafficking, need urgent attention, but they do not lend themselves to national solutions.

The global flows of development assistance keeps growing, both in financial terms and the number of new organisations. The private sector is playing a greater role, including multinational companies and global capital. Aid agencies are decentralising their operations to national offices in developing countries, and employing more local staff in the process. Some middle-income countries have begun to operate their own aid programs to lower-income countries. Funders are requiring increased accountability and demonstrated impact.

In response to this complex and evolving environment, employers are demanding higher qualifications and leadership skills from their employees. They are seeking a new cadre of professionals ready to take new approaches to complex problems; innovators who are strategically agile in collaborating and synthesising across sectors and organisations.

This innovative and multimodal program will equip you with the necessary skills and knowledge to be a successful manager and leader in the development industry. Graduates will be able to successfully navigate the space between different sectors and be thought leaders, bringing new ideas into your workplace, supported by practical knowledge and skills in project management.

The Master of Leadership in Global Development is specifically designed for mid-career managers and advanced professionals working in development, who aspire to leadership roles in this field.
